ENGLISH

To the outside world, they were secretaries simply doing what secretaries do. But on the inside, they worked with spy William Stephenson, alias "Intrepid". Appointed by Churchill to head the British Security Coordination Service in New York, Stephenson recruited more than 800 women to work in codes and ciphers, communications, clandestine radio communications and mail interception. Meet the "secret secretaries" from this top secret intelligence organization who kept their secret and learn more about the spy "Intrepid" whose accounts helped inspire spy novels such as the popular James Bond series.
